Zac Jackson Gives Ideas on Building a Social Media Policy

Today, social media -- Facebook, Twitter, Snapchat -- is more accessible than ever before. Right from their phones, people young and old are putting their faces and words out to a larger audience than ever before and aren't always aware how fast news can travel, or that they're making news. Often, it's the kind of news coaches/bosses/administrators would rather not be making.

The first step of managing the social media boom was and continues to be education. In terms of high school sports and high school athletes, that means making sure players understand the reach of social media and the responsibility they have not to embarrass themselves, their teammates or their schools with inappropriate posts. By now, social media is so popular and widespread that policies for using it and policing it have become a must.

Big corporations now have social media policies. Small companies now have social media policies. College and pro teams have social media policies. So, your teams/programs should have them, too.

Whatever code of conduct or agreement to team rules should include a social media policy, and in a way that policy should mirror the conduct code. The most common social media offenses committed by young athletes include inappropriate language, personal attacks and hints to obscene/sexual/private events.

At Ohio State, Urban Meyer's Twitter rule is no team business goes on social media. USC's policy says nothing "demeaning, threatening, derogatory or unsportsmanlike." Some coaches insist their players submit all their accounts/usernames to be followed and must follow back. Some coaches have a window of time before and after games blocking social media use. Whatever you do, stress authenticity and accountability.

Some ideas and principles for your policy are below.

FOR COACHES

After an NFL or NBA game, the locker room is closed to reporters for a set amount of time after the game for a cooling off period. High school games are emotional, too, so you may consider instituting a social media cooling off period. You'll probably see fewer emotional responses to game results after two (or even) 12 hours than you will on a bus ride home.

You can't stop parents from sending tweets or posting Facebook messages about their child's playing time or your coaching. You can share with the parents that you'd rather not read messages about their child's playing time or your coaching.

Reinforce that writing/posting from someone else's account, pretending to be someone else or making inflammatory/inappropriate statements is no different than forging a signature or signing your name to someone else's paper. Kids get caught in the moment being angry or trying to be funny and don't realize the reach something on social media can have.

FOR ATHLETES

Choose your words wisely. If you wouldn't say it to your coach, your principal, your mother or the local newspaper reporter, don't put it on social media. Because if you do, those are the four people you're going to answer to.

Nothing is truly private. Ever. If you type those words or snap that photo, there's no telling where it may go.

Talented athletes have lost scholarships, average athletes have been suspended from big games and student section members have lost their privileges to go to games over posting inappropriate material, making personal attacks or generally getting caught in the moment and not realizing what they thought was a private message or a personal conversation could easily be taken and shared with a much bigger audience.

Say thank you. Support others. Be consistent and positive.

A lot of people write "retweets are not endorsements" on their Twitter profiles. That's a pretty weak defense. Sharing someone else's inflammatory statement, hurtful accusation or obscene word/song lyric has caused problems for teams/athletes in the past.

You're representing your teammates, your coaches, your school and your family at all times.

FOR ALL INVOLVED

Think before you post. Taking team/school/player issues online generally isn't going to make them better.

Nothing threatening, racial, sexual or discriminatory should ever make it to social media. If it does, nothing spreads faster.

Use social media as a chance to reinforce messages and positives, not magnify problems and issues. Your team motto/slogan/catch phrase is a great place to start and probably looks better on an athlete's profile than "first-team all-conference" or any other individual accomplishment/statement.

Know your position, your platform and some simple math:

Win a game and 100 people might read about it.

Win a district title and 1,000 people might read about it.

Do/say something really dumb on social media and 1,000,000 people might read about it.
